HIS ROMANTIC LIFE.

The Remarkable Story of the Career of Robert Louis Stevenson, the Successful Novelist.

WON ANOTHER'S WIFE.

An Accommodating Husband Helps His Consort to Secure a Divorce and Then Gives Her Away to Stevenson.

San Francisco special: Robert Louis Stevenson, the novelist, has been discussed a good deal by the critics, but many facts in regard to his personal history have never been published. These facts will interest, as they reflect the character of the man-his Bohemianism and his complete disregard of public opinion or ordinary conventionalities of society. A clever critic has said that Stevenson alsomething of this is shown in that remarkable sketch called "Markelheim," in which the murderer of the old dealer in antiquities debates with the devil whether he shall give himself up to the law or escape. Stevenson's face gives ome indication of his character. He was seen several times during his short stay in San Francisco. None of the photographs or sketches of the man give any correct idea of his appearance. The marked feature is the eyes, which were very wide apart, and of Oriental shape, though they are set squarely in his square head, and are covered by very heavy, straight, black brows, that give them a certain fierceness. These eyes are usually like an opium smoker's—dxll, and fixed on some vision that blots out the every day world. The squareness of Stevenson's upper head is contradicted by the lower face, which has a which the murderer of the

TENDENCY TOWARD EFFEMINACY.

The whole figure, with the velveteen jacket which he ordinarily wears and the long hair falling over the collar, might be taken for an art student of Munich out for taken for an art student of Munich out for an airing. Stevenson first came here about eight years ago to get married. His bride he had met in France when she was the wife of a Californian. When Stevenson was taking that trip that bore fruit in his delightful book, "An Inland Voyage," he met in Paris Mrs. Samuel Osborne, of San Francisco. She came of Dutch parentage, her maiden name being Van de Grifft, but she had married young Sam Osborne, who was private secretary to Senator Stanford and somewhat of a protege of the railroad millionaire. She was a brilliant brunette, with the vivid coloring and many of the tastes of a Gypsy. Her husband had gone with her on a vacation, but he had been recalled on business and she was then staying with friends in the French capital. She and Stevenson fell in love at first sight. She and Stevenson fell in love at first sight.

She and Stevenson fell in love at first sight. Their literary and persor at tastes ran in the same channels, and the author spent much time in her company. He professed to draw inspiration from her society, and when she left for home it was understood that she was to get a divorce from her husband by means of the easy processes of the California courts, and when this was accomplished that Stevenson would come out to the Golden state and make her his wife. Everything was carried out according to this programme. When Sam Orborne was told of the desire of his wife he but, like a model American husband, gave his wife all the aid in his power. The result was that she secured her freedom. Then the tidings were sent to the distant lover, and he prepared to come out into the west after his inamorata. Original in everything, he determined to take his trip in novel fashion. So he engaged passage in the steerage of one of the great ocean lines, with the design of writing up his experiences. He secured plenty of material, for the voyage was rough and he had a sorry time among the emigrants, who were herded together like sheep. This experience, however, didn't cure him, as he took passage in an emigrant car and crossed the plains in that fashion. This was worse than the steerage trip; as the people were MADE NO OBJECTION, and crossed the pians in that rashion. This was worse than the steerage trip; as the people were packed closer and the journey, owing to the many delays and slow time, consumed two weeks. When Stevenson reached San Francisco he was a sorry object. Ushada backing cough, spat blood reached San Francisco he was a sorry object. He had a backing cough, spat blood, and had contracted a troublesome skin disease from herding with unclean emigrants. Foul air and poor food had reduced his strength, and he was a seminivalid. He was received, nowever, with open arms. As soon as he was cleaned up and a trifle recovered from the fatigues of the long journey the wedding was held. The remarkable feature of it was that Sam Osborne was present, and gave away the bride, his ex-wife, with a heartiness of manner that would have done credit to the most disinterested person, while he

CAPPED THE CLIMAX of his performance by introducing to the bride and groom a handsome and stylishly-dressed young woman as his affianced wife. It takes Bohemianism to rise superior to such an American specimen of elective affinities as this, but the actors in this strange scene were equal to it. The marriage feast was very gay, and soon after it was over Stevenson went with his bride to a deserted mining camp on Howell mountain, in Napa mining camp on Howell mountain, in Napa county, to recuperate his health. There he wrote the book wilch he called "The Silverado Squatters," which is one or his best things, although justice has never been done it by the reviewers because of their unfamiliarity with the scenes it describes. Stevenson lived for several months at the deserted mining camp of Silverado, breathing in health with the bassam of the pine and the redwood. He was thus financially reduced and he had no reputation in this country. redwood. He was thus financially reduced and he had no reputation in this country. His book on his California experiences went a begging, and finally the Century editors published it in several installments. It is a curious fact that Osborne, to whose good nature Stevenson was indebted for his wife, disappeared shortly after his second marriage. He dropped out of his old life and his old haunts here between two days, and no one ever learned any trace of him. What the cause was also

REMAINED A MYSTERY.

The dashing young woman whom he wedded remained here for several months after Sam deserted her, when she, too, packed up her belongings and departed as studenly and mysteriously as her spouse. To this day neither of them has ever been seen or heard of by their old friends. When Stevenson came over the ocean this last time he traveled with all the luxuries. On his former visit his advent was not chronicled, and he received no courtesies from the literary lights of Ne York. This time a score of reporters were waiting to interview him the moment he came off the gang plank, and he was forced to decline the social honors that were heaped upon him. Everything he did or said was made the subject of newspaper paragraphs; he figured in several of the magazines, and an old story written years before for a child's magazine in England was revamped, sold to a syndicate and read by hundreds of thousands. Everything that he writes finds an earger market among the publishers at the highest price. Look-ing back over his career since his first visit to California, when he was poor, almost friendless and without literary reputation that was peculiarly valuable—looking back over these years, there is nothing in his romances that is more remarkable than the story of his own great success. His search for health in the south seas has not been successful, but if it results in a ro-mance of savage life or of buccaneer adventure the reading world will be the richer for it.

Eupepsy.

Many young ladies are ruining their complexion by the continued use of poisonous cosmetics and so-called face washes. The greater number of these preparations contain mineral poisons, that in time, shrivel up the skin and give the appearance of dissipation and old age. Dutard's Specific is not a paint, but a great beautifier, inasmuch as it removes all blemishes from the skin, instead of covering them. It cures chapped hands with one application. Sold by R. S.
